151 AN UNIQUE CHARLES II "WAX JACK," or Stand holding a large taper roll for sealing

This piece might perhaps be described in form as resembling a windlass. The two supports at either side are reminiscent of the style used in fire dogs of the period; they rest on wide scroll feet and have flame tops, while at the centre of each is fitted the taper roll, the ends of which are chased and embossed with different Stuart flowers. Fixed to the top is a snuffer-shaped implement for holding the taper—this has bird handles and an angel-head screw.

It is interesting to compare the different details in the decoration of this notable specimen with other well-known styles of the period: the "Stuart" flowers are identical with those found on the salvers and porringers, the beaded ornament is frequently worked on the handles of the mugs and tankards; the engraved leaves are commonly found on the backs of Stuart spoons, and the pierced work is typical. In fact everything is right: the most careful examination reveals no suggestion of anachronism.

Complete London Hall marks: Maker's mark P. R. in cypher with pellet below; date letter badly stamped, circa 1680; 9½ in. high, wt. 26 ozs. 4 dwts.

* * * The Wax Jack is traditionally believed to have been given by Charles II to an ancestor of the late Colonel Fellows, possibly Benjamin Fellows of the City of London (see Burke's Landed Gentry).

No other example is believed to be known, neither can we trace a piece in the least similar. It is therefore no exaggeration to say that an unique specimen of English 17th century work has come to light and that the discovery of another, is to say the least, unlikely.

By the same maker is a Porringer in the Victoria and Albert Museum, and Flagons at S. Clement's, Eastcheap.

151 AN UNIQUE CHARLES II "WAX JACK," or Stand holding a large taper roll for sealing

This piece might perhaps be described in form as resembling a windlass. The two supports at either side are reminiscent of the style used in fire dogs of the period; they rest on wide scroll feet and have flame tops, while at the centre of each is fitted the taper roll, the ends of which are chased and embossed with different Stuart flowers. Fixed to the top is a snuffer-shaped implement for holding the taper—this has bird handles and an angel-head screw.

It is interesting to compare the different details in the decoration of this notable specimen with other well-known styles of the period: the "Stuart" flowers are identical with those found on the salvers and porringers, the beaded ornament is frequently worked on the handles of the mugs and tankards; the engraved leaves are commonly found on the backs of Stuart spoons, and the pierced work is typical. In fact everything is right: the most careful examination reveals no suggestion of anachronism.

Complete London Hall marks: Maker's mark P. R. in cypher with pellet below; date letter badly stamped, circa 1680; 9½ in. high, wt. 26 ozs. 4 dwts.

* * The Wax Jack is traditionally believed to have been given by Charles II to an ancestor of the late Colonel Fellows, possibly Benjamin Fellows of the City of London (see Burke's Landed Gentry).

No other example is believed to be known, neither can we trace a piece in the least similar. It is therefore no exaggeration to say that an unique specimen of English 17th century work has come to light and that the discovery of another, is to say the least, unlikely.

By the same maker is a Porringer in the Victoria and Albert Museum, and Flagons at S. Clement's, Eastcheap.
